

Jeremy Page is a founding partner in the international trade law firm of Page-Fura, P.C. Mr. Page has more than 25 years of experience representing companies on the full gamut of import/export issues. From an import perspective, Mr. Page develops and implements comprehensive compliance programs designed to meet the standards of the Customs Modernization Act, as well as to satisfy internal corporate self-governance requirements. Mr. Page has conducted scores of internal reviews, developed customized compliance manuals and supporting procedures, and performed training of key personnel throughout the organizational structure. He has also represented companies before both U.S. and foreign import agencies on discrete import issues, including transfer pricing policies and practices, general customs valuation, tariff classification and engineering, free trade agreement and preference program eligibility/compliance, country of origin determinations, foreign-trade zones, duty drawback, and prior disclosures and investigative/enforcement proceedings.

Where exports are concerned, Mr. Page provides counsel on the full range of export, re-export and deemed export issues confronting today's multinationals. That representation includes performing compliance audits and other evaluations of clients' compliance programs, as well as representing companies on issues involving commodity jurisdiction, export licensing and control, deemed export/re-export program development and enhancement and sensitivity training. It also entails representation before BIS, OFAC, DDTC and Census on voluntary self-disclosures and/or enforcement proceedings.

In addition to his legal background, Mr. Page is also a licensed customs broker
